Do you have any idea how difficult it is to foster aggressive birds out? Specially the large birds. The one catalina lunges at everyone but Brett but as soon as he goes to touch her she starts moaning and panting. She did rip the top of his finger off once also. To top that off she is feathering up but mostly bald. The blue and gold is so underweight and will never get her feathers back due to the follicle damage but she is getting better for us. The two timnehs are not so great. Both males, badly plucked, I have managed to finally get them both to step up but are unpredictable and will bite once they get on you.

The yellow collar macaw is the worst. He wants no human contact with anyone other than 2 people I have seen but due to the look of him, neither were interested as he is missing feathers from his cheek patches down and all around his neck. Some are starting to grow back but not sure how many he will get. ALL of their hormones are just below the surface and panting starts almost instantly with touching.

Eventually we will have success with these birds but it will probably take a couple of years. We finally win them over and fix them and they bond to us only we have to rehome them again. It is harmful and I would like to see the practice stopped.

Why not just buy breeders rather than turn these poor pet birds into something they are not. It all boils down to saving a few bucks or getting a free bird.
